Note from Janel Schrunk about this “Homeschool Proof Document”.....

Each year, there are many questions about the “Homeschool Proof Document.” Some parents have not wanted to sign this document, thinking that it will be used against them at a later date. This form is not turned in to the publisher of the test. No one else will see it but the test administrator and anyone who helps her. In order to take the Stanford 10 administered in a group of students who are not in a school environment, we have to certify that all are homeschooled. What the publisher does not want you to do is have your child practice for a later test—that is, your student who is enrolled in a private or public school should not take the test twice. This skews the results of the test and is considered cheating. You also are agreeing not to discuss the test content. This is very import to the test publishers! A few weeks after the test results are returned to us, the test administrator shreds the “Homeschool Proof Document.”

A student is considered to be home schooled if the majority of the child's academic education is privately funded and provided at home rather than in a classroom setting. Students whose education is home-based but provided by a publicly funded school would not be considered to be home schooled for purposes of these tests.
